James B. Girand Appointed To Supervise Construction of Flood Control Dam-Is Well Known

Here

James B Girand, one of the most prominent engineers in Arizona, chief engineer of the Gillesple diversion dam on the Gilla river about 15 miles went of Phoenix—the longest multiple arch dam in the world—and creator of the so-called Girand plans for the control of the lower Colorado river for irrigation and power purposes, was appointed supervising engineer over the proposed Cave creek flood control works yesterday afternoon. The appointment was made by the board of zovernors in charge of the Cave creek project and came after the names of several other engineers had been discussed.

Girand has lived in Arizona for 25 years, during which time he has been connected with some of the most important engineering efforts in the state. He built the railroad from Williams to the Grand Canyon, which was later to engross almost all of his attention as the scene of the greatest development project in the world. For eight years he was state engineer, serving in that capacity under Governor Kibbey and Governor Sloane. He has been connected also with the Santa Fe railway, and is well known generally from the Grand Canyon to the board of the most important steps yet taken with regard te it e ultimate completion of the Cave creek dam, although it was pointed our that there are yet several other steps to be made before actual construction work begins.
